Major repairs were needed among other things, the ships' boilers were smashed - but it was imperative to maintain the illusion that Britain still had at least two effective battleships in the area. A half dozen other Italians in semidiving masks had been picked up, and it seemed possible that they were all who had been involved in this ingenious and hazardous operation. So to carry out the illusion to air observers, life went on as usual on the decks of both ships—bands played, the crews were mustered for inspection at the usual hours, small boats came and went on their ordinary schedules. The ruse succeeded; apparently the enemy never knew of the success of his attack.
